Have you ever wondered why some people come up with ideas that are so ahead of their time? If you haven't, you've been asleep. That's what happened to Bruce Clay, a fairly unknown tech writer in the late 70s. For five years Clay was working on a product that would allow a computer's CPU to interact with the world. It was such a simple concept but required having a slight shift in the way companies engineered their computers. The concept for his product was never patented, but Clay dreamed of a future where it would be commonplace. His simple idea would revolutionize the way we live our lives today, without even realizing it. Cloud computing, neural technology, and artificial intelligence aren't even in our normal thinking. They might as well be magic. That was in 1983. Technology was just in its infancy in the 80s. It was the time for things like Google and Facebook to come into being. It would be more than 20 years after that concept was put in motion before something as revolutionary as cloud computing would occur. One would be able to say that, with the advent of cloud computing, the Internet has also entered the next phase. The invention of the computer has caused mankind to ascend from the Stone Age into the Industrial Age. Along that path, the thinking of how we solve problems and the manner in which we live has been shaped. Our physical world seems to be getting smaller and smaller with the emergence of technology.
